Re-Globe Seminar Series

Sustainable Development and International Finance The EU Approach

8 April 2024, 13:00 – 15:00 (CET)

Sala A Belmeloro, Via Beniamino Andreatta, 8 - Bologna

This seminar explores the International and European initiatives concerning Sustainable Finance, as the process of integrating climate, environmental, and social sustainability considerations into financial services. The first part focuses on the international policy debate on Sustainable Finance resulting from the numerous initiatives taken in the last decade by states, international institutions, as well as private actors, and hybrid coalitions worldwide. The second part delves into the most relevant EU reforms to steer capital market flows toward sustainability, highlighting the role of the EU as a forerunner in the global Sustainable Finance space. This is due to its wide-ranging and unrivalled policies, such as the Taxonomy Regulation and other legislative acts on transparency, reporting, sustainability risk management, and sustainable financial instruments like green bonds. The third part of the seminar sheds light on a new type of international actor involved in sustainable finance, namely sovereign wealth funds, and examine the main strategies adopted by their respective States of nationality to take account of sustainability when investing in financial markets.

From Sustainable Development to Sustainable Finance: A Global Call for Action

Dr. Tiziano Bussani (University of Milan)

The first part of the seminar explores the global debate on Sustainable Finance, as the process of integrating climate, environmental, and social sustainability considerations into financial markets. After introducing the concept of Sustainable Development, it focuses on the main international initiatives supporting the reform of the international financial system toward environmental and social sustainability, namely through the convergence of policy action and normative acts from States, public regulators, international institutions as well as from private actors and hybrid coalitions worldwide. Hence, the proper “global” nature of the Sustainable Finance landscape is evidenced by referring to the different laws, regulations, and standards governing sustainable financial instruments and markets at different levels of governance.

The Shaping of the Concept of 'Sustainability' in the EU Agenda

Dr. Federica Agostini (European University Institute)

Building on the first part of the seminar, the second part will delve into some of the most relevant EU initiatives to steer capital market flows towards sustainability goals. It will focus on the drivers, key features and implications of previous and ongoing policy reforms aimed at articulating the concept of sustainability in the financial context, with specific emphasis on the EU Taxonomy, the EU Green Bond Standard and the Proposal for a Regulation on ESG ratings. The presentation will portray the role of the EU as a forerunner in the global sustainable finance space, while highlighting the grey areas as well as the challenges in policy design and implementation.

New Players in the Arena: Sovereign Wealth Funds and Sustainability

Dr. Marco Argentini (University of Bologna)

The third part of the seminar will examine the strategies adopted by Sovereign Wealth Funds (SWFs) to integrate sustainability standards into their investments. Indeed, their long-term horizon (when compared to that of other public investment instruments), which typically focuses on future generations and intergenerational equity, can lead to climate change considerations playing a significant role in defining their investment strategies. Yet, the criticism has been made that SWF approach to the ecological transition might be more business-oriented than philanthropic. International practice has witnessed the establishment of a number of networks of state investments vehicles focused on environmental impacts, such as the One Planet Sovereign Wealth Funds initiative, launched in 2017 by six major SWFs. From a regulatory perspective, a proposal has been made to address the matter by amending the Santiago Principles, a non-binding guiding instrument for SWFs. Within this framework, it has been proposed to add a new principle requiring that investments take into account sustainable development, with a particular focus on environmental protection.
